PERSPECTIVES ON CONTEMPORARY LEGEND

NICOLAE CONSTANTINESCU

Until not so long time ago, the study of the contemporary legend seemed to be a rather American or Anglo-Saxon speciality, as the previous eleven conferences of the ISCLR were held in North America or Great-Britain, the editors and most of the contributors of the first volumes of the publication *Perspectives on Contemporary Legend*¹ were from the same geographic area, and the genre itself seemed to be deeply rooted and widely spread in this cultural space. It is now, for the first time, when the ISCLR Conference steps on the Continental Europe, in France, due, mainly, to the conjugated efforts of Véronique Campion-Vincent, of the Maison des Sciences de l'Homme in Paris, and Mark Glazer, of the Department of Psychology and Anthropology of the University of Texas, U.S.A., the co-chairpersons of the meeting.

Initially scheduled for four full days (eight sessions of four papers each), a fifth day was needed in order to cover the large number of participants registred for this major scientific event. The 34 papers read in the conference covered a wide range of subjects, divided into six main sessions: Theoretical Issues in Contemporary legend (2); Literature, Art and the Contemporary Legend (1); Satanism, Abuse and the Contemporary Legend (1); Medicine and the Contemporary Legend (1); Case Studies (4); Index, Research and Film (1).

To the, traditionally, by now, most numerous Anglo-American participants (the Canadians and Australians included), a large number of European scholars added. Besides some 'old, I mean wellknown 'combatants' like Bengt af Klintberg (Sweden), Rolf Brednich (Germany), Peter Burger (the Netherlands), Ingo Schneider (Austria), Véronique Campion-Vincent and Jean-Bruno Renard (France), some other cultural areas were attracted toward this fascinating topic as, for instance, Italy (Paolo Toselli), Israel (Benjamin Beit-Hallahmi), Romania (Nicolae Constantinescu). This comes to prove (if necessary) that the 'genre' as well, the contemporary legend, does exist one may say all over the world, but the scientist were not interested, did not collect and did not study it to the same extent as it was done in the above mentioned areas.

On the other hand, it must be noticed that the 'object' (contemporary legend) is often taken in a very personal way, depending on the purpose of the study and on the scholar's own perspective — sociology, psychology, psychiatry, psychotherapy, literature, folklore, ethnology, communication, sociolinguistics, history, mentalities etc. In fact, when discussing the theory of the contemporary legend, there is a kind of a 'gentlemen agreement', but when dealing with the 'thing'/'text'/'narrative', it seems to be so multiform, slippery and everchanging so that everyone feels free to do whatever he/she wants to do with this 'object'. As a „friend-of-a-friend (FOAF) tale“, the contemporary legend belongs to everyone and to nobody, to every place and to no place, to the remote time and to the nowadays as well. It is why, even when discussing some case studies, the papers and the comments turned over general but essential questions such as: the relationship of legend and reality (Brian McConnel, Nicolae Constantinescu), legend and ambiguity (Gillian Bennett), legend and group identity (Gary Alan Fine & Jeff Victor), legend as a process (Bengt af Klintberg), legend and rumors (Oliviane Brodin), new and old behaviour patterns and narrative responses (Benjamin Beit-Hallahmi), traditional world-view and contemporary popular culture (Gary R. Butler), Are the Terms 'Modern' and 'Contemporary' Synonymous? (Jacqueline Simpson) etc. And even broader arose the questions: Why do people tell such stories? What is the use of it? How does legend 'work' in our society? Here are some answers: "...the legend (of the 'Bosom Serpent') persisted in tradition because it allows people suffering from a number of complaints to visualise, understand and describe their symptoms to themselves and others"; "the legends are thus a language in which the efficacy of traditional versus conventional remedies may be explored and evaluated" (Gillian Bennet, Medical Aspects of 'The Bosom Serpent' Legend); "the basis for most of this violence (depicted in the C. L.) is the anxiety created by features of modern life and culture which are reflected in these stories; ...it is the fear these acts of violence stir up that make the contemporary legend and dynamic and convincing" (Mark Glazer, Proscription, Violence and Contemporary Legend); "the function of many legends is to give concret shape, in the form of an example, to the people's feelings of uneasiness about foreign elements in their daily life, elements that rightfully or not are seen as threats to their security" Bengt af Klintberg, The Functions of Legend Narration in the Modern World); "the contemporary legends are caused by our society's fears for whatever we don't know of, and thus we are afraid to be harmed by" (Lucia Vecchia, Classification and Cataloguing of Contemporary Legends: An Italian Example).

And, my Lord!, there is so much 'fear', 'anxiety', 'threat' around us: AIDS (Genevieve Paicheler, Legends about the Origins of AIDS in the French Public: From Conjectures to Certainty), UFO (Mark Moravec, Legends, Memorates and Mythologies: the Case of UFO Folklore); kidnapping (Paolo Toselli, Child Kidnapping and the Body Parts Black Market); food contamination (Oliviane Brodin, Individual Dif-
